

Market Update: September

International:

September was a positive month for risk assets, with markets reacting to a shift in the tone of global monetary policy. The resumption of the U.S. Federal Reserve's rate-cutting cycle, combined with the ongoing enthusiasm surrounding artificial intelligence and the absence of new geopolitical shocks, was enough to support gains across equities, sovereign bonds, and corporate credit. Unlike the previous month, the U.S. dollar remained stable against major currencies. However, that stability did not prevent a notable depreciation against gold, which rose nearly 11% during the period.

In the U.S., the highlight was the FOMC meeting, where policymakers decided to cut interest rates by 25 basis points to a range of 4.00%–4.25%. The decision was accompanied by guidance indicating two additional cuts are expected by year-end, as well as one dissenting vote in favor of a larger 50-basis-point reduction. Overall, the message signaled a growing concern with economic activity – rather than inflation – as the main driver of policy decisions. This stance reduced the probability of a near-term recession and helped lift market sentiment.

On the other hand, labor market data showed early signs of fatigue: the economy reportedly lost 32,000 jobs in September (according to private surveys), marking the weakest result since March 2023. Consumer confidence also declined, suggesting that economic momentum is increasingly dependent on continued strength in the technology sector.

In Europe and China, September's data releases had limited incremental impact. Both regions continue to struggle with subdued growth, and no major new stimulus measures were introduced. Currency appreciation against the U.S. dollar has helped ease inflationary pressures, particularly in Europe, where investors are watching for potential central bank signals of rate cuts in the coming months. In China, the upcoming Five-Year Plan (2026–2030 – expected to be unveiled in Q4 – should provide greater clarity on the country's long-term structural and policy priorities.

Domestic (Brazil)

Brazil's economy continues to demonstrate resilience, though key growth drivers – credit, consumption, and investment – are beginning to slow under the weight of high interest rates, external trade frictions (tariffs), and limited fiscal room for additional stimulus. At its September meeting, the Central Bank of Brazil took a surprisingly hawkish stance, signaling no room for rate cuts in the near term. As a result, two-year real interest rates now hover around 9%, an unsustainable level for any economy, indicating structural imbalances that will need to be addressed in the not-so-distant future.

Considering the upcoming 2026 presidential and gubernatorial elections, when candidates typically avoid unpopular measures, substantial reforms are unlikely to occur before early 2027 and will depend heavily on the electoral outcome.

The main political development of the month was the approval by the Lower House of Congress of income tax exemptions for individuals earning up to R$5,000 per month, with partial reductions for those earning up to R$7,500 – a key campaign promise and a major political win for the administration. The measure will be offset by higher taxation on monthly incomes above R$50,000, although other originally proposed revenue sources – such as the taxation of CRIs, CRAs, LCIs, LCAs, infrastructure debentures, and real estate funds – were removed during congressional negotiations.

This tax reform is expected to be a major talking point in the government's upcoming campaign, though it has so far had little impact on domestic asset prices, suggesting that markets are taking a wait-and-see approach.
